Research Publications

This project is in collaboration with the Center for Native Health Partnerships (CNHP) at Montana State University and the seven Indian Reservations of Montana. This article describes the experiences of six individuals employed as community-universities research liaisons. The liaisons were located in Native American communities and bridged the communities and the universities, providing information between these groups, expanding understanding and knowledge of how research can address health disparities, and assisting in the development and on-going work of partnerships using CBPR approaches. While tribal communities within the state face similar health disparities, the approach to solving these disparities must be based on an understanding of the context and environment of the specific tribal community.
