Ya'at'eeh,

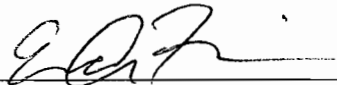

My name is Dwight Largie and I am Kin'ya'aanii, born for To'ahani, shicheii'ei Hashtlishni, shinali'ei To'baa'hi. I have worked in the field of technology and telecommunications through education, trade, and policy throughout my appointments as a student, intern, technician, lead, manager, and director. I attain my undergraduate degree from Fort Lewis College in Durango, Colorado and my master's degree from Middlebury College in Middlebury, Vermont. As an undergraduate, I pursued a degree in computer science-CS option. Although I have earned an undergraduate degree in English and a graduate degree in English, I gained extensive experience and knowledge in information technology and telecommunications from my academic achievements and prior employment experience.

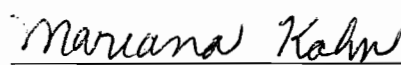

The area of telecommunication technology infrastructure development is providing a direct service for our nation to communicate effectively. Telecommunications encompasses an array of services from airport communication, 911 response, telemedicine, infrastructure development (pipeline, electric, fiber, etc), education, to cell services for patrons of the Navajo Nation. I feel telecommunication is vital to our communities. As a commissioner, I plan to improve services and create an overall structure of telecommunication technology that will be sustainable 100 years from now. An infrastructure as such, would be inclusive of telecommunication and information technology law that is current and compatible with other laws that coincide like international policy, natural resources, and trade laws to name a few. As a commissioner, I will work collaboratively with the commission and internal governmental personnel to ensure our telecommunication airwaves continue to sustain our communities.
